

The War on Terror in Classrooms and Clinics: An Inventory

Editors' Note: As part of this symposium issue on the impact of the war on terror on legal education, the Journal of Legal Education asked law schools, through academic listservs, to tell us about the courses and clinics they have created or substantially altered in the wake of the 9/11 attack and the resulting wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. We verified these contributions on law school web sites (which led to a few additional courses and also to some deletions). We have displayed this data in two ways, first by separately listing courses and clinics, and then combining both in a listing by law schools. Although this inventory is likely not comprehensive, it nonetheless indicates the robust and varied response by law schools to the momentous legal and political developments of the past decade. This online version was updated in March 2011 but we continue to welcome additional contributions and/or corrections at jle@swlaw.edu.
